Staycation Edition

Since domestic and international travel has slowed to a virtual halt, people won't be traveling very far anytime soon. Literally millions of Americans have already postponed or cancelled vacations entirely. In the meantime, local staycations seem to be most people's only option, unless you have a second vacation home or extra money to spend on a short-term rental or hotel with limited human contact.

In the days when a flight seemed to be a safe luxury, a staycation was a code for "chill vacation" – a short, sometimes local trip with limited traveling and expenses. The goal of a staycation is to relax in a place that is close to home but still a novel environment. But now that most cities and states are on lockdown, how do you plan a fulfilling break in a space you've occupied every hour of the day for the past couple of months? What if you aren't afforded a significant amount of time off?

It's also possible that, due to the coronavirus, people with jobs might take even less time off work than they usually do- whether they hold essential positions or are working from home, for reasons like an overabundance of work or fear of future layoffs. Regardless of circumstances, it is important that you take time away from work to enjoy the little things in life and hit that 'reset' button, even if its only for a few days. Below are some tips for making the most out of your staycation this year. For one, when are you ever going to want to 'act as a tourist' in your own town again? And its also a wonderful way to support local industry, who so desperately need our help! Here at Warren Wealth, we are seizing this rare opportunity! Share with us your thoughts on staycations! We would love to hear them!
